Foreword

To the public we extend, in the name of the 1914 Bobashela, greetings. Of its praiseworthy features we need not speak, for they stand as tributes to themselves. The things that our publication lacks we pass over in silence, trusting that they may escape your eye. Our only regret, in looking over the pages, is the fact that it fails to reveal the spirit behind the classes and organizations which we here portray. It has been with us a labor of love, and if you, the friends and students of the institution, find in these pages not only a portion of merit but of pleasure we shall be satisfied.

To

PROFESSOR E. Y. BURTON

The student's truest friend and adviser, whose name stands for college spirit, and whose untiring energy and enthusiasm is ever active in aiding Millsaps, we dedicate this tenth volume of the
BOBASHELA.

Senior Prophecy

Secretary of Millsaps College, Jackson, Miss.

JUNE 5, 1921.

DEAR SIR:

I received your letter asking for information of my class—that of 1914. I must confess that it was hard to find out much about the class. I searched in the New York World, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the Jackson Daily News—but in vain. I have sought diligently in all the cross-road papers, and by various other means I have ascertained the salient facts of their haunts, habitats, and occupations. Some of the records were somewhat surprising, but most of them have continued, more or less, in the habits and characteristics they displayed at college.

Brumfield, it seems, is establishing a very fine record in law. He is getting along very well in almost every respect, even financially, in spite of the fact that he has been married some two or three years. Presumably Ott can out-argue his wife.

A very interesting career is that of J. B. Cain, formerly recognized at Millsaps as "some" social-stunter. He is known very widely as the author of "Social-Stunting and How To Do It." In the preface to the book, he states that he regrets that he ever held that there was no such thing as love. Kid is fast catching on and has almost learned how to take a hint.

John Wright Chisholm is an evangelist in the country-districts. Bearing a ponderous dignity, he is making a great success. They say that money can't help but come his way, and some of his collections would make Billy Sunday look like thirty cents. Eventually, I think he will succeed in bringing cosmos out of chaos.

T. M. Cooper has made tours all over the known world in quest of geological specimens. On one trip he went into the Crater of Vesuvius. While there, an eruption started in the Archeozoic region and came up through the Proterozoic, Paleozoic, Mesozoic and Cenozoic. Sprout was blown two miles, six hundred seventy-two feet, four and five-sevenths inches above base level. He insists, however, that he has not yet experienced anything hotter than the fire at the Main Building in 1914.

S. L. Crockett has recently been expelled from the Senate Chamber in Washington for hollering and disturbing the peace on Pennsylvania Avenue at night. He is back home now, making a hot race for Notary Public, with the aid of his wife and all the other suffragettes. We feel sure that Vete will come out victorious in this, so great a race.

Nolan Harmon has charge of a work in Louisiana. The people on his charge seem to like him well, having all faith in everything he says, and believing that he knows everything. From this blindness may they be speedily delivered.

Hathorn is prospering as a lawyer in Wanilla. He has succeeded in running almost all the other cheap lawyers out of his community. Perhaps it is his sentimentality that enables him to clear negroes, as fast as they steal, for half the sum of what they steal.

Donald Howe, better known as Doc, has discovered some important steps in connection with wireless telegraphy and telephony. We were sorry to learn that he accidentally killed his wife by the explosion of chemicals in his laboratory, which was directly underneath the kitchen. After having buried all of her that he could find, Old Frau is doing his best to overcome the catastrophe.

BOBASHELA

Miss Stella McGehee has already been recognized as a poetic genius by the literary public. Her best poem is "Working the Faculty for a Pass," a sociological poem in blank verse. Her only trouble is a prosaic husband who doesn't know an iambic meter from a meter-stick.

Mitchell has sprung into prominence since the publication of his treatise "A Symposium on the Study of Greek and Latin at Millsaps College." The central thought of his very wordy theme seems to be Pass or Bust. It is affectionately dedicated, of course, to Dr. Swartz.

Waldo W. Moore, Jr., practiced law a few years at Bay Springs, after leaving college. His social stunting ceased when he eloped with a North Jackson girl and settled down in Mexico. Here's hoping that the revolutionists won't be any rougher than the shack fellows were.

John Phillips has done more or less resting since he finished school. He has followed astronomical work and has succeeded in establishing wireless communication with Mars. Among other things, he reports that the boll weevil has struck there and that just now politics are hot. So far he hasn't learned their latest dances nor how the girls wear their hair.

D. J. Savage is the teacher of a little country school and a candidate for beat constable. He has been turned out of Church twice—once for telling the things that he did in chemical laboratory, and the other time for trying to elect delegates to District Conference by secret caucus. Duroc Jersey always would politic.

R. E. Selby is, of course, making good in his work. He expects soon to be advanced to an eight hundred dollar work and, besides, not to have more than eight churches in his charge.

Miss Steen went as a missionary to China. There she was very popular—so much so that she became attached to the Chinese Government. Since then, however, she has been dismissed for asking so many questions. Strange how habits will stick to a person!

J. W. Ward is a pitcher in one of the minor leagues. Once in his life he has a team that will support him. Once on a recent trip to Africa with his team he knocked several natives senseless with his fast spit ball, and struck out the umpire and three bystanders. Ploughboy always was some pitcher.

I am sorry to inform you that as yet I have done nothing worthy of mention. True, I have gotten some literary ability through writing twenty page letters to the girls, but if my present plans are successful I shall soon cease even from that, for my wife will compel me to do so.

Trusting that I have given you the desired information, I desire to subscribe myself

ONCE THE PROPHEET OF THE FUTURE BUT NOW THE HISTORIAN OF THE PAST.

MAIN BUILDING

History of The Senior Class

It was in the fall of 1910 when this band of students, sixty in number, assembled to have their names enrolled upon that great book so carefully guarded and preserved by our secretary. After being duly initiated into the mystic rites of college life by those who thought themselves wiser than we, we astonished the professors with our brilliant answers in class, and after our first exam, on account of there being so few failures, it was decided at a special call of the faculty meeting to dispense entirely with the extra fee for exams. It was our class who brought the faculty to a realization that the first of April was and has to be a National Holiday.

Not only did we win honors in the class rooms, but we made ourselves felt as a mighty force on the athletic field and in the society halls. There was little wonder that we excelled all preceding classes in Bible Study, for we had right in our midst a Cain and a Daniel, who were both quite Able men. We all agreed that Math was a "sop" and never dreamed of going to class without the most careful preparation.

After a summer of recreation we returned, rejoicing in the fact that we were no longer to be styled "green little freshies." We profited by our past experiences and found the way much easier. We had long since learned better than to call our English Professor "Mr. Kern," and were no longer afraid he would expel us from school for laughing in the library. We failed to make many new discoveries in the chemical laboratory, but we tried mighty hard to memorize the text. Many of our men established for themselves a reputation on the athletic field which will not be forgotten in years to come. "Plow Boy," spurning all offers of the national league teams, won for himself great fame as a pitcher on our baseball team.

By the time we had reached the Junior Class our ranks had become much thinned. How near, yet how far we seemed from that much-coveted Senior Section.

And now at last that we have come to the final year of college life we have a mingled thought of joy and sadness. By an accident of fire we have been deprived of our main building, made sacred to each of us because of happy associations with it. We will have the privilege—for we truly count it thus—of graduating in the "Prep" Hall. Truly, not all our efforts have been crowned with success, but we have learned to make our failures "Stepping stones to higher things."

And now, as we go forth, realizing fully the responsibilities of our positions, let us ever be mindful of the noble and lofty ideal which our professors have endeavored so faithfully to set before us. No longer will the difficulties be smoothed by the kind words and aid of our class mates; but memories of their friendships will be lasting. As we each one take up the duties of life, let this thought be paramount in our minds:

"True worth is in being, not seeming;
In doing, each day that goes by,
Some little good, not in dreaming
Of great things to do by and by.
For whatever men say in their blindness,
And spite of the fancies of youth,
There's nothing so kindly as kindness,
And nothing so royal as truth."

B. G. S., Historian.

The Gods Are Kind

The grey towers of Fairmont College rose shadowy and ghost-like in the thickly gathering mist of a November evening. The clang of the bell announced the hour of five to the line of waiting girls in the big hall.

"Down the Avenue, this evening, girls," directed Miss McLeod, taking her place and leading the line out across the campus. The girls giggled expectantly as they followed the Lady Principal.

"And remember, please," she finished, "that perfect order must be maintained."

The Avenue led past the Baylor School of Technology, and the sturdy Techs were very open in their admiration of Fairmont. Admiration that often took a violent form in the most ardent but oftentimes ill-fated love missives; and persistent hanging out on every corner and street that the Fairmont girls frequented. Especially would they turn out on the evenings the girls invaded the Avenue. On these occasions the stern, erect figure of Miss McLeod would be seen leading the line—stern and uncompromising, looking straight ahead yet seeing on all sides and mentally marking the names of many fresh young fellows from her list of eligibles to the informal receptions at Fairmont that were so eagerly looked forward to by the Tech boys. The Lady Principal used this prerogative with an impartial hand, striking terror to the hearts of many poor youths, who never seemed to have this in mind until their more fortunate companions received little square envelopes with the crest of Fairmont College on the flap. Then their thoughts would reluctantly fly back to various evenings on the Avenue, when fearlessly they had called to the Fairmont girls, and in the eyes of Miss McLeod, scandalously flirted with them—who, if we must have the truth, were eager enough to flirt back, if it were not for the unrelenting figure at their head. So once a week the girls giggled expectantly as the Lady Principal herself took her place at the head of the line and led them out down the Avenue, not daring to entrust to one of her teachers this important place, and ever admonishing her girls to keep perfect order.

On this particular evening Jack Reilly, the sturdy fullback of the Tech Invincibles, was on the Avenue. Jack had no time for girls—and all the adoring glances he received on the field from the young ladies in the grand-stand underneath Baylor's gold and crimson had no effect on Jack. Down the Avenue he came with a crowd of swaggering young fellows.

"Hey, the old duenna is with them this evening," spoke up a chap in a loud voice.

"Nothing strange 'bout that," answered Red Hoskins.

"And so much the better! We'll worry the old lady. Come on, fellows. Let's let them know we are around here," put in a third.

"Perfect order, girls," commanded Miss McLeod in an undertone, meeting the boys with a cold, staring eye. But the ears of Fairmont were elsewhere.

"Hey, there, girlies!"

"Three cheers for Fairmont!"

"Hello, little blondie!"

"You look good to father!"

And many other similar expressions as the line passed, besides many stage whispers thrown out for the benefit of the Lady Principal.

Jack Reilly passed the line with an amused smile playing on his good-natured face. He idly wondered what pleasure this gave his fellow Techs. Suddenly he looked around as one will when feeling a presence—looked around into two brown eyes, dark, liquid, talking eyes that looked out from a face of equal attractiveness, framed in a mass of raven black hair. Jack was startled. Never before had he realized the beauty that a pair of brown eyes could give to a girl and certainly never before had he seen such eyes with such a setting. Fairmont passed on, safe under the capable leadership of their Lady Principal, amid the farewells yelled back by the Techs. And through it all Jack walked as in a dream, hearing nothing about him, but with the picture of two brown eyes still before him—liquid, roguish eyes that put a fellow on his mettle. Impressed? Why, Jack had an insane desire to follow the Girl; all memory of Miss McLeod and her charge having left him.

Should he ask the fellows who she was? Did anyone else get his vision? Did he want the fellows to know how he was struck? These questions rapidly passed through his mind.

"Jack, old kid, what did you think of them?" spoke up the loud voiced chap.

"Who was the girl with the blue dress on?" ventured Reilly.

"The girl with the blue dress on! Listen to our ladies' man, Mr. Jack Reilly," yelled a fellow.

"The girl with the blue dress on!" took up the crowd. "Joke! Joke!"

Reilly was dazed and a little sore that his question should be treated so hilariously, until the surprising information dropped out that all the girls were in blue—Fairmont's uniform. Poor Jack! His sight had been somewhat limited.

But the Girl stayed with him. Two talking brown eyes looked out at him, sometimes smiling, sometimes with a roguish twinkle—and then best of all, in an appealing sort of way. He must meet the Girl. And it was his secret. His fellow Techs must never know—or he would never hear the last of it. Over and over he repented for having indifferently tossed aside his invitation to Fairmont's first reception a few weeks back. When would he have another chance, and would the Girl know him from the other Techs? Jack was constantly asking himself such questions, and all the while making every effort to find out more about the Girl. Again and again he was on the Avenue as the line in blue was marshalled past. The Girl was always in her place, with eyes sometimes roguish, sometimes appealing, but always straight ahead, or so far beyond Jack that the poor fellow would walk off crestfallen.

But one evening the Girl failed to appear in the line. Reilly looked frantically for her, but he saw nothing but a blurred line of blue. And all the next week he was grouchy. He lagged at practice on the field—something that the full-back had never done before.

"Hey, Reilly," growled the coach. "Get your pep! Get your pep! What's the matter with you?"

But the girl appeared with the line next week, and Jack found his pep accordingly.

On Thanksgiving Baylor's last football game was to be fought out with the State University. This was the big game of the season and the coach was putting his Invincibles through a week of hard practice. School after school had gone down before the gold and crimson team this season, but they had tackled no foe that measured up to the State University's team. Fairmont occupied reserved boxes in the grand-stand. As the Invincibles trotted out on the field, Reilly felt a thrill through and through as he saw Baylor's gold and crimson entwined with the white and blue of Fairmont. Never before had Baylor's grand-stand witnessed such a struggle. Long and hard did the Techs struggle, but it was a struggle with giants. Six to six stood the score at the end of the third quarter.

"Fellows, I'm betting on you," called the coach from the side line.

The band struck up Baylor's "Rah, Rah," song, and Fairmont waved frantically as the Tech eleven trotted back for the last quarter. Jack Reilly felt new blood in his veins. He also felt the presence of two liquid brown eyes—expectant eyes now. He felt that his chance had come, and a few minutes later, seizing the ball, the sturdy full-back rushed down the field for a touchdown.

The grand-stand, the bleachers, and the side lines arose with one mighty shout. Yell after yell went up for Reilly. Never before had Baylor such a hero. Was it fancy or reality that Jack saw, amid the waving streamers of gold and crimson, two brown eyes smiling down on him from the grand-stand as he was borne triumphantly from the field?

Anyway, two days later the Girl smiled at him on the Avenue, smiled gloriously, and her eyes seemed to have a wishful longing in them, just as if they would love to know Baylor's hero. Or so it seemed to Jack. Soon after, the news went over the campus that Fairmont would be at home to the Tech boys the next week. Never before had Jack had such thrills. At last he would meet the Girl! But if he could only manage beforehand to let her know how eager he was to meet her, and what it would mean to him! Could he write a note? He remembered that several fellows had secret correspondents at Fairmont. But would he be able to get the note to the Girl? Again he remembered that the girls were on their campus on Sundays without the oversight of teachers, and in this way many friendships had been formed between the two schools.

Jack decided to try this method of reaching the Girl. Sunday evening found him a piker around Fairmont. Groups of girls here and there noticed a young Tech hanging around, but Jack's eyes were busy looking for the Girl. Nowhere was she to be seen. However, two sharp eyes from an upper window did see Reilly waiting on the campus steps and a few moments later Miss McLeod was down the stairs sailing across the campus. With a short whistle to himself Jack watched the Lady Principal approach, knowing well what the interview would mean.

"Young man, did you wish to see someone?"

"Beg pardon, Madam?" asked Jack, fighting for time.

"You know full well that this is positively against our rules. You probably don't realize that you are compromising our girls—something that we cannot allow," Miss McLeod hurried on, waxing eloquent. "You wouldn't think of hanging around a private home like this—and just make a comparison. Hasn't Fairmont the same right to protection? Our girls are sent here for protection, as well as for work. And you know full well that no intercourse is allowed between the two schools, except on occasions for that purpose. And certainly no young man who gives us trouble will be permitted to attend our receptions."

Jack's heart sank. "Very well, Madam," he answered as Miss McLeod paused. "You will not have any more trouble from me." He turned to go, cursing himself over and over for this bonehead stunt.

"And will you please give me your name?" finished the Lady Principal.

"Reilly, Madam. Jack Reilly."

Well, it was all up with Jack. His dreams of meeting the Girl were all gone. This interview meant that he was black-listed for the rest of the year. Never before had the fellow experienced such disappointment. If he had not acted such a fool in hanging around Fairmont! If some one would only kick him as soundly as he deserved!

BOBASHELA

It was a sick Jack that saw the little square envelopes with Fairmont's crest passed about to the eligible Techs a few days later. Over and over to himself he swore that never again would he have time to notice girls—even girls with liquid brown eyes. But this was the night of the reception! The night that could have meant so much to Jack. A few days later he passed the line of blue, but not with sufficient nerve to keep his eyes ahead, and once again the Girl smiled at him, smiled gloriously. And Reilly smiled back. Poor Reilly!

Weeks passed. The Techs were at hard work, preparing for examinations. They were less and less often on the Avenue now. One raw December evening Jack was coming out from the city. The car was crowded with early Christmas shoppers, and he was lucky to find a place on the back platform. With a jerk that sent the standing passengers falling over each other, the car stopped at Fairmont Avenue, and in alighting a lady stumbled from the car and fell on the slippery pavement. Jumping quickly from the car, Reilly assisted the lady to rise. With a start he recognized Miss McLeod, who from her movements was evidently hurt.

"Are you hurt, Madam?" solicitously questioned Jack.

"My foot—it must be sprained! Oh, what a pain!" Fairmont was a mile down the Avenue, and night was quickly gathering.

"If you will let me help you to the house right here at the corner, I'll call a cab," suggested Reilly.

The offer was gratefully accepted, for the sprain was a bad one, and Miss McLeod was evidently suffering. A half hour later a cab stopped at Fairmont, and Jack carried the Lady Principal up the steps into the big hall.

"I shall not forget this, Mr. Reilly," she gratefully murmured. "I hardly know what I would have done without you."

"I am very glad I happened along, Miss McLeod, and I trust that the sprain will not give you trouble." Reilly turned to go. Outside in the cold, bracing air he suddenly realized the situation. He had actually invaded the sacred precincts of Fairmont!

Exams had come and gone. Baylor Tech was eagerly looking forward to the approaching holidays. And once again the little square envelopes with the blue and white crest found their way to the campus. Was it possible that Jack found one in his box! Could it be a mistake? With trembling hands he took out the card, the usual invitation to Fairmont's Christmas reception, with the personal signature of Miss McLeod, Lady Principal! Small wonder that Jack saw visions that night, and all through the next day—visions of brown eyes, liquid, expectant eyes.

With a fast beating heart he presented himself at Fairmont on the eventful night. Miss McLeod was receiving the guests from her chair.

"Mr. Reilly," she beamed, cordially extending her hand; and Jack suddenly noticed that her face was sweet and gentle in spite of her sharp eyes. "So glad to have you here. I am anxious to know which of our girls you desire to meet."

Jack smiled and looked around. The gods were kind. There stood the Girl framed in a nearby doorway.

"Could I meet the young lady in the door?" he asked tremulously.

Miss McLeod smiled, for this was by no means an infrequent request.

"Certainly. Margaret, dear," called the Lady Principal. At last! The eyes were approaching.

"Miss Letcher, may I introduce Mr. Reilly?" Jack was looking into two liquid brown eyes. And they were happy, satisfied eyes now, as he dreamingly led her away.

My Zoological Flame

Dear girl, I wish I knew her well,
And yet I dare not call,
For spiders' webs and mud wasps' nests,
And ugly things that crawl,
Cocoons and bugs and toads adorn
Her desk and stand and wall.

Sweet girl, I'd love with her to walk,
If only I could stop her,
When she picks up, upon the spot,
An innocent grasshopper,
And tells his whole anatomy,
I do not think it's proper!

Bright girl, I'd like to chat with her
But she speaks of Hymenoptera,
Of the stages of the Blastula,
And the various Orthoptera,
Of segments, somites, symmetry,
And of the Coleoptera.

Fair girl, I'd like to be her friend,
But may the gods protect me!
Perhaps she'd give me some such name,
Or else perchance dissect me,
Examine, analyze, and draw,
And never again collect me.

With a Golfer's Apologies to Tennyson

BLANK, blank, blank—

As I top the ball on the tee,
And I would that my tongue dare utter
The thoughts that arise in me!

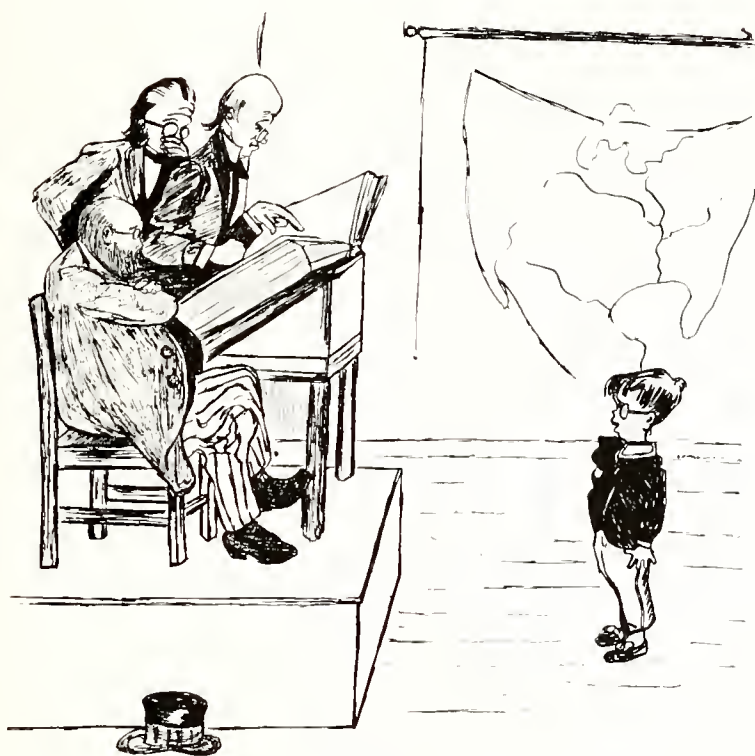

Oh, well for my partner good
That he isn't watching the play.
Oh, well for the caddie-lad,
That he's deaf as a post today.

And my partner's ball sails on
To the last hole over the hill.
But oh, for the stroke of some fairy's wand
To hasten my ball which lies still!

Blank, blank, blank—
As I top the ball on the tee.
But another chance for the game that is lost
Will never come back to me.

Punch Bowl.
